The Phantom Tollbooth

By Norton Juster

NARRATOR: There was once a boy named Milo who didn't know what to do with himself-not just sometimes, but always. Wherever he was he wished he were somewhere - else, and when he got there he wondered why he'd bothered. Nothing really interested him-least of all the things that should have.

MILO: It seems to me that almost everything is a waste of time, I can't see the point in learning to solve useless problems, or subtracting turnips from turnips, or knowing where Ethiopia is or how to spell February.

NARRATOR: And, since no one bothered to explain otherwise, he regarded the process of seeking knowledge as the greatest waste of time.

MILO: And worst of all, there's nothing for me to do, nowhere I'd care to go, and hardly anything worth seeing.

NARRATOR: And then, to one side of the room, just next to the phonograph, he noticed something he had certainly never seen before. Attached to one side was a bright-blue envelope which said simply:

MILO: FOR MILO, WHO HAS PLENTY OF TIME.

NARRATOR: He opened the envelope, but just to be polite.

MILO: ONE GENUINE TURNPIKE TOLLBOOTH. EASILY ASSEMBLED AT HOME, "What a strange present,"

NARRATOR: He hopped in [to his small electric automobile] and, for lack of anything better to do, drove slowly up to the tollbooth. As he deposited his coin and rolled past he remarked wistfully,

MILO: I do hope this is an interesting game, otherwise the afternoon will be so terribly dull."

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

INTRODUCTION

The Phantom Tollbooth by Norton Juster

NARRATOR: Suddenly he found himself speeding along an unfamiliar country highway, and as he looked back over his shoulder neither the tollbooth nor his room nor even the house was anywhere in sight.

MILO: What a strange thing to have happen, Here I am riding on a road I've never seen, all because of a tollbooth which came from.

NARRATOR: Before long he saw in the distance the towers and flags of a city sparkling in the sunshine, and in a few moments he reached a great wall and stood at the gateway to Dictionopolis.

GATEMAN: A-H-H-H-R-R-E-M-M, This is Dictionopolis, a happy kingdom, advantageously located in the Foothills of Confusion and caressed by gentle breezes from the Sea of Knowledge. Today, by royal proclamation, is market day. Have you come to buy or sell?"

MILO: I beg your pardon?

GATEMAN: Buy or sell, buy or sell, Which is it? You must have come here for some reason.

MILO: Well, I--"

GATEMAN: Come now, if you don't have a reason, you must at least have an explanation or certainly an excuse,"

MILO: (Shakes head)

GATEMAN: Very serious, very serious, You can't get in without a reason. Wait a minute; maybe I have an old one you can use."

NARRATOR: He took a battered suitcase from the gatehouse and began to rummage busily through it, mumbling to himself,

GATEMAN: "No ... no ... no ... this won't do ... no . . . h-m-m-m . . . ah, this is fine,"

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

NARRATOR: He held up a small medallion on a chain, dusted it off, and engraved on one side were the words "WHY NOT?"

GATEMAN: That's a good reason for almost anything-a bit used, perhaps, but still quite serviceable."

NARRATOR: And with that he placed it around Milo's neck, pushed back the heavy iron gate, bowed low, and motioned him into the city.

MILO: I wonder what the market will be like,

NARRATOR: Thought Milo as they drove through the gate; but before there was time for an answer they had driven into an immense square crowded with long lines of stalls heaped with merchandise and decorated in gay-colored bunting. Overhead a large banner proclaimed, "WELCOME TO THE WORD MARKET" And, from across the square, five very tall, thin gentlemen regally dressed in silks and satins, plumed hats, and buckled shoes rushed up to the car, stopped short, mopped five brows, caught five breaths, unrolled five parchments, and began talking in turn.

5 GENTLEMEN: "Greetings! Salutations! Welcome! Good afternoon! Hello!

NARRATOR: Milo nodded his head, and they went on, reading from their scrolls.

5 GENTLEMEN: By order of Azaz the Unabridged-- King of Dictionopolis-- Monarch of letters-- Emperor of phrases, sentences, and miscellaneous figures of speech--We offer you the hospitality of our kingdom, Country, Nation, State, Commonwealth, Realm, Empire, Palatinate, Principality"

MILO: Do all those words mean the same thing?

5 GENTLEMEN: Of course. Certainly. Precisely. Exactly. Yes, You see, Dictionopolis is the place where all the words in the world come from. They're grown right here in our orchards. Once a week by royal proclamation the word market is held here in the great square and people come from everywhere to buy the words they need or trade in the words they haven't used. Enjoy yourself in the market,

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

NARRATOR: Above all the noise and tumult of the crowd could be heard the merchants' voices loudly advertising their products.

MERCHANT 1: "Get your fresh-picked ifs, ands, and buts."

MERCHANT 2: "Hey-yaa, hey-yaa, hey-yaa, nice ripe wheres and whens."

MERCHANT 3: "Juicy, tempting words for sale."

MERCHANT 4: "Step right up, step right up-fancy, best-quality words right here, Step right up-ah, what can I do for you, little boy? How about a nice bagful of pronouns-or maybe you'd like our special assortment of names?"

NARRATOR: Milo had never thought much about words before, but these looked so good that he longed to have some.

MILO: Maybe if I buy some I can learn how to use them," NARRATOR: Said Milo eagerly as he began to pick through the words in the stall. Finally he chose three which looked particularly good to him- "quagmire," flabbergast," and "upholstery." He had no idea what they meant, but they looked very grand and elegant.

NARRATOR: And he continued on through the market. [When the five very tall, then gentlemen once again appeared]

5 GENTLEMEN: 'Ah' there you are. here have you been? We've been looking all over for you. The royal banquet is about to begin. Come with us.

NARRATOR: They seemed very agitated and out of breath as Milo walked along with them.

5 GENTLEMEN: Right this way. Follow us. Come along. Step lively. Here we go.

NARRATOR: They shouted, hopping from the wagon and bounding up a broad marble stairway. Everyone seemed quite grumpy about having to wait for lunch, and they were all relieved to see the tardy guests arrive. There was an ear-shattering blast of trumpets, entirely off key, and a page announced to the startled guests:

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

PAGE: KING AZAZ THE UNABRIDGED.

NARRATOR: The king strode through the door and over to the table and settled his great bulk onto the throne,

KING AZAZ: "Places, everyone. Take your places."

NARRATOR: He was the largest man Milo had ever seen, with a great stomach, large piercing eyes, a gray beard that reached to his waist, and a silver signet ring on the little finger of his left hand. He also wore a small crown and a robe with the letters of the alphabet beautifully embroidered all over it.

KING AZAZ: What have we here?

MILO: If you please, my name is Milo. Thank you very much for inviting me to your banquet, and I think your palace is beautiful.

5 GENTLEMEN: Exquisite, Lovely, Handsome, Pretty, Charming,

KING AZAZ: SILENCE, Now, young man, what can you do to entertain us? Sing songs? Tell stories? Compose sonnets? Juggle plates? Do tumbling tricks? Which is it?"

MILO: I can't do any of those things.

KING AZAZ: What an ordinary little boy, Why, my cabinet members can do all sorts of things. The duke here can make mountains out of molehills. The minister splits hairs. The count makes hay while the sun shines. The earl leaves no stone unturned. And the undersecretary, hangs by a thread. Can't you do anything at all? . . . Time for the speeches, You first,

MILO: Your Majesty, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to take this opportunity to say that in all the--"

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

KING AZAZ: That's quite enough, Mustn't talk all day. NEXT!"

GUEST 1: Roast turkey, mashed potatoes, vanilla ice cream,

MILO: What a strange speech,"

NARRATOR: Thought Milo, for he'd heard many in the past and knew that they were supposed to be long and dull.

GUEST 2: Hamburgers, corn on the cob, chocolate pudding.

GUEST 3: Frankfurters, sour pickles, strawberry jam,

NARRATOR: And so down the line it went, with each guest rising briefly, making a short speech, and then resuming his place. When everyone had finished, the waiters reappeared immediately, carrying heavy trays, which they set on the table. Each one contained the exact words spoken by the various guests, and they all began eating immediately with great gusto.

KING AZAZ: Dig in, I can't say that I think much of your choice."

MILO: I didn't know that I was going to have to eat my words.

KING AZAZ: Of course, of course, everyone here does. You should have made a tastier speech."

NARRATOR: Cried the king, clapping his hands three times. As he did so, the waiters rushed back into the room and quickly cleared away the dishes, the silver, the tablecloth, the table, the chairs, the banquet hall, and the palace, leaving them all suddenly standing in the market place.

KING AZAS: Good luck, good luck; do be careful!

NARRATOR: And down the road Milo went. And the crowd waved and cheered wildly, for, while they didn't care at all about anyone arriving, they were always very pleased to see someone go. The shore line was peaceful and flat, and the calm sea bumped it playfully along the sandy beach. In the distance a beautiful island covered with palm trees and flowers beckoned invitingly from the sparkling water.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

MILO: Nothing can possibly go wrong now. And there's plenty of time. It certainly couldn't be a nicer day, NARRATOR: And as soon as he'd said it he leaped from the car, as if struck by a pin, and sailed all the way to the little island, which now looked completely different. Instead of palms and flowers, there were only rocks and the twisted stumps of long-dead trees. It certainly didn't seem like the same place he had seen from the road.

MILO: Pardon me,

NARRATOR: Said Milo to the first man who happened by;

MILO: Can you tell me where I am?"

THE MAN: Pardon me, can you tell me who I am?"

NARRATOR: The man was dressed in a shaggy tweed jacket and knickers with long woolen stockings and a cap that had a peak both front and back, and he seemed as confused as he could be.

MILO: You must know who you are,

THE MAN: You must know where you are, To be sure, you're on the Island of Conclusions. Make yourself at home. You're apt to be here for some time."

MILO: But how did I get here?

THE MAN: You jumped, of course. That's the way most everyone gets here. It's really quite simple: every time you decide something without having a good reason, you jump to Conclusions whether you like it or not. It's such an easy trip to make that I've been here hundreds of times.

MILO: But this is such an unpleasant-looking place.

THE MAN: Yes, that's true, it does look much better from a distance.

NARRATOR: As he spoke, at least eight or nine more people sailed onto the island from every direction possible.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

MILO: Well, I'm going to jump right back,"

NARRATOR: Milo took two or three practice bends, leaped as far as he could, and landed in a heap two feet away.

THE MAN: That won't do at all. You can never jump away from Conclusions. Getting back is not so easy. That's why we're so terribly crowded here. Oh no. The only way back is to swim, and that's a very long and a very hard way.

MILO: I don't like to get wet,

THE MAN: N either do they, That's what keeps them here. But 1 wouldn't worry too much about it, for you can swim all day in the Sea of Knowledge and still come out completely dry. Most people do.

NARRATOR: Milo decided to swim, He swam and swam and swam for what seemed like hours. At last he reached the shore, thoroughly exhausted and completely soaked.

MILO: From now on I'm going to have a very good reason before I make up my mind about anything. You can lose too much time jumping to Conclusions, NARRATOR: The car was just where Milo'd left it, and in a moment he was on his way again as the road turned away from the sea and began its long climb into the mountains. Just ahead, stood a very elegant-looking gentleman. He was beautifully dressed in a dark suit with a well-pressed shirt and tie. But his expression was somewhat blank. In fact, it was completely blank, for he had neither eyes, nor mouth.

TERRIBLE TRIVIUM: Hello, little boy, I wonder if you could spare me a little of your time and help with a few small jobs?

MILO: Yes, indeed.

NARRATOR: Said Milo, who wondered for just a moment how it was possible for someone so agreeable to have a face with no features at all.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

TERRIBLE TRIVIUM: Splendid, I would like to move this pile from here to there, but I'm afraid that all I have are these tiny tweezers.

NARRATOR: And he gave them to Milo, who immediately began transporting one grain at a time. The very pleasant man continued to stare vacantly while Milo, worked hour after hour after hour after hour after hour after hour--

MILO: Pardon me, but it's going to take eight hundred and thirty-seven years to do this job. It hardly seems worthwhile,.

TERRIBLE TRIVIUM: WORTHWHILE! My young friend, what could be more important than doing unimportant things? If you stop to do enough of them, you'll never get to where you're going. (villainous laugh). I am the Terrible Trivium, demon of petty tasks and worthless jobs, ogre of wasted effort, and monster of habit." (Milo begins to back away slowly).

TERRIBLE TRIVIUM: Don't try to leave, for there's so very much to do, and you still have over eight hundred years to go on the first job.

MILO: But why do only unimportant things?"

NARRATOR: Asked Milo, who suddenly remembered how much time he spent each day doing them.

TERRIBLE TRIVIUM: Think of all the trouble it saves. If you only do the easy and useless jobs, you'll never have to worry about the important ones which are so difficult, You just won't have the time. For there's always something to do to keep you from what you really should be doing . . . . RUN! RUN!"

NARRATOR: And as he ran, Milo suddenly remembered his home. He wanted very much to go back, He clapped his hands and the little car appeared, polished like new. Milo got in and with one last look, started down the road. In a few minutes he reached the end of his journey deposited his coin and drove through. And almost before realizing it, he was sitting in the middle of his own room again. But where the toolbooth had been, there was not nothing at all. He searched frantically throughout the apartment, but it had vanished just as mysteriously as it had come and in its place was another bright-blue envelope, which was addressed simply:

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

MILO: "FOR MILO, WHO NOW KNOWS THE WAY."

NARRATOR: He opened it quickly and read:

MILO: Dear Milo, You have now completed your trip, courtesy of the Phantom Tollbooth. We trust that everything has been satisfactory, and hope you understand why we had to come and collect it. You see, there are so many other boys and girls waiting to use it, too. It's true that there are many lands you've still to visit and wonderful things to see (that no one has yet imagined), but we're quite sure that if you really want to, you'll find a way to reach them all by yourself.

NARRATOR: And, in the very room in which he sat, there were books that could take you anywhere, and things to invent, and make, and build, and break, and all the puzzle and excitement of everything he didn't know-music to play, songs to sing, and worlds to imagine and then someday make real. His thoughts darted eagerly about as everything looked new-and worth trying.

MILO: Well, I would like to make another trip,but I really don't know when I'll have the time. There's just so much to do right here.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

SOURCE INFORMATION

Author: Norton Juster
ISBN: 978-0394820378
Publisher: Bullseye Books
Date (Month/Year): Oct 1988

AWARD HISTORY

2009 National Qualifier
2012 National Qualifier
2014 National Qualifier

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY