The Princess and the Pea

By AJ Jacobs

INTRODUCTION

Ugly princes, fibbing fairy godmothers, and knights who prefer clown suits to suits of armor - these clearly aren't your ordinary fairy tales. They are, in fact, Jay Ward's infamous Fractured Fairy Tales, originally introduced within Ward's brilliant Rocky & Bullwinkle Show, on television in the 1960s.

From princesses who take destiny into their own capable hands, to inept witches with broomstick envy, to beauties who happily discover their inner beasts, these tales contain surprisingly modern messages of female empowerment – Unless, of course, you are a Princess named Clyde. The Princess and the Pea as collected and published by AJ Jacobs.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

NARRATOR: It seems that once upon a time there was a kingdom without a princess, and this concerned the king and his ministers greatly.

PRIME MINISTER: (showing and tapping a chart) We are facing a severe heiress deficit We must immediately increase the number of young female royal individuals in the palace vicinity.

KING: (sighing) You mean we've got to find a princess.

PRIME MINISTER: That's what I said.

NARRATOR: This wasn't an impossible task. The king once did have a princess, but she had been lost since childhood. The king and his ministers simply had to figure out how to track her down. But just as they got started thinking, they were interrupted by the court jester, Million Laughs Charlie.

CHARLIE: Thank you, thank you. Good to be here, folks! (shaking rattle) You know, the other day, I walked into this bar, and there was this Irishman and this rabbi-

KING: Please, we're doing some business here. (to ministers) How about if we offer a million gold crickles to the princess when she shows up.

CHARLIE: A million gold crickles! I'd love to help on this project. Do you remember what she looked like?

KING: No.

CHARLIE: Good! I mean, that's too bad. (rubbing his hands)

KING: She was just a baby when she left. But I'll know her by the way she passes this test I have in mind.

NARRATOR: But Million Laughs Charlie wasn't listening anymore. He wasn't even there. Charlie had run home, called up his date for the night-a lovely maiden who lived next door-canceled on her, and got straight to work on his scheme. He recruited his friend Clyde, a rather big man with a rather small brain, to help. And before Clyde knew what had happened, he had on a blond wig, a lot of lipstick, and was on the way to the palace to meet the king.

CLYDE: (whining) I don't want to be no princess! These high heels are killin' me.

CHARLIE: Shush. Hey, King. I'd like to introduce you to your princess!

KING: Hmm, she's got more of a five o'clock shadow than I remember my princess having. But if she passes the test, then I'll know she's the one.

NARRATOR: With that, the king led the make-believe princess to a tall pile of mattresses. Under the bottom mattress, he explained, there was a small pea. If she was a real princess, she would be so refined, so sensitive, that even a tiny lump like that wouldn't let her sleep. The make-believe princess climbed to the top of the pile and lay down as Charlie, the king, and his ministers waited at the bottom. In the morning, the king and his court climbed to the top and, sure enough, the make-believe princess was snoring away blissfully.

PRIME MINISTER: Ah-ha! This individual lacks the qualities necessary to be a member of the royal family.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

KING: (sighing) He means this ain't no princess.

NARRATOR: Charlie and Clyde found themselves escorted out of the palace, helped along by a swift kick or two on the bottom from the palace guards.

CHARLIE: (shouting) Now you've done it, you hussy!

NARRTOR: But Clyde didn't get off that easily. Over the next few days, Charlie dressed his friend up in a red wig, a brown wig, and a browner wig and sent him off to the palace to pretend to be another girl. Hoping to keep him up, he would feed Clyde coffee and tell him scary tales about monsters and politicians. But each time, Clyde would sleep soundly through the night. And in the morning, he would be forced to leave the palace, rubbing his rear. After several days of this, the two dejected men went back to Charlie's house to regroup. There, Charlie's neighbor was out in the yard, washing her carriage.

CHARLIE: Hey, honey, my business deal fell through. Got some time on my hands. What say we go out and have a bite to eat, MAIDEN: Sorry, Charlie. I'm exhausted. I didn't get a wink last night. I think there was a pea under my mattress."

CHARLIE: Did you try maybe reading anything by John Updike? (Beat) Wait a sec. Didn't sleep a wink'?

NARRATOR: Yes, Charlie had figured it out. This really was a princess. The real thing. The girl that would get the million gold crickles and all the titles of her realm. Before you could say "greedy no-goodnik," Charlie had taken the girl to meet the king.

KING: Oh, darling (hugging his daughter). Here's a million gold crickles-minus thirty percent for taxes-plus your choice of any man in the kingdom.

MAIDEN: Wow! Any man in the kingdom? (smiles and looks at Clyde) Oh, Clyde. Will you be mine?

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

CLYDE: For keeps!

NARRATOR: That's the story. The king had his daughter, the princess had her gold, and Clyde had the princess and they all lived happily ever after. Ooops. Almost all lived happily ever after. Poor Million Laughs Charlie spent the rest of his days unsuccessfully trying to sell unauthorized fairy tales of the king and his court.

SOURCE INFORMATION

Author: AJ Jacobs
Book: Fractured Fairy Tales
ISBN: 978-0553099805
Publisher: Bantam Books, Inc.
Date (Month/Year): Nov 1997

AWARD HISTORY

2012 National Qualifier

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY