Hangman

By William Borden

THEODORE: Don't you feel some dishonesty? Killing people you have so much in common with?

ROGER: I don't find it dishonest, no. Poignant, perhaps. Ironic. Tragic, even. It's like playing a part in a great drama. It fulfills me. Whereas you become nameless, faceless, one of many who die futilely.

INTRODUCTION

BOTH: "Hangman"
THEODORE: By William Borden

(THEODORE, watched by ROGER, stands on a stool, tying a rope to a pipe or beam. He finishes and steps off the stool. They both appraise it/or a moment, then ROGER tugs at the rope. The rope comes off ROGER throws the rope to THEODORE.)

ROGER: You think I haven't seen everything? Every trick and ruse you scum could possibly think of? You think I'm not smart?

THEODORE: You're very smart.

ROGER: I am.

THEODORE: I imagine you have a Ph.D.

ROGER: Don't get smart with me. (THEODORE ties the rope again.)

THEODORE: This will be a foolproof knot. Guaranteed to kill instantly.

ROGER: Not instantly. We want you to ponder your ways, reflect on your errors, as you dangle, swaying slowly in the breeze. Then we allow you to expire.

THEODORE: Expire.

ROGER: Yes.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

THEODORE: You have an enormous vocabulary.

ROGER: Thank you.

THEODORE: A veritable prodigious lexicon in your cerebrum.

ROGER: I read vociferously. No television, no card games – I have the complete collection of The Great Books.

THEODORE: The Great Books? Who wrote them?

ROGER: You know those guys, from Homer and the Bible to Melville and Prowst.

THEODORE: Prowst?

ROGER: You're not too well read yourself, are you?

THEODORE: No, I'm not.

ROGER: Prowst was a French guy, wrote in a cork-lined room, suffered from asthma. He pursued the nuances of the past. Cherchez the past. And he was a fag. (ROGER tests the beam.) That's better.

THEODORE: Might be too sturdy.

ROGER: Naw.

THEODORE: I might not dangle long enough. I have a lot of sins to reflect upon as I die.

ROGER: They go fast. Whole life in a flash. That's the rumor.

THEODORE: As I dangle.

ROGER: As you dangle.

THEODORE: In the breeze.

ROGER: In the breeze.

THEODORE: What breeze? We're indoors. Miles from daylight. So you've told me.

ROGER: Well, just the momentum, as you plunge through the opening, and the rope, you know, jerks you up, as you're plunging down - gives your body what they call a torque, an angular momentum, so your body, as it's expiring, will swing, from its own potential energy.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

THEODORE: Torque.

ROGER: You'll sway in quite graceful circles, or possibly ellipses, around and around.

THEODORE: Like a pendulum.

ROGER: Exactement.

THEODORE: I could become a clock.

ROGER: If I left you there.

THEODORE: Then you were lying about the breeze.

ROGER: It was a bit of poetry.

THEODORE: Do you write?

ROGER: Reports?

THEODORE: Poetry.

ROGER: Me?

THEODORE: Let me hear something.

ROGER: Naw...

THEODORE: Please! (ROGER pulls out a fat sheaf of scraps of paper. Then he looks at THEODORE.)

ROGER: You'll laugh. (THEODORE doesn't answer. ROGER hesitates, then starts to read.) "The rope sings like a nightingale as it snaps across the breeze" Maybe breeze isn't right there. (ROGER takes out a pencil.) "The rope sings like a nightingale as it snaps ... into the ... abyss ... of death."

THEODORE: "Death" 's trite.

ROGER: You're right. "Abyss of ... "

THEODORE: "Like a raven." "Raven" 's better than "nightingale." "Raven" connotes the harshness of the moment.

ROGER: It's a beautiful moment. Lyrical. And for those who disagree, there's the irony, the poignant reversal of expectation. "Abyss of ... "

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

THEODORE: "Horror."

ROGER: "Abyss of ... "

THEODORE: "Meaninglessness." "Nothingness." "Darkness."

ROGER: "Into the abyss of..."

THEODORE: "... into the sweet memory of roses." (ROGER looks at him a moment, then writes it down, shoves packet into his pocket.)

ROGER: (Reluctantly) Thanks. (ROGER tests the knot. It holds.) Good work.

THEODORE: Thanks.

ROGER: Of course it's not a professional job.

THEODORE: I'm going to hang!

ROGER: I'd think that would be a particular reason for taking pride in your work. Here. (ROGER hands THEODORE the other end of the rope.)

THEODORE: Now what?

ROGER: The noose. Make the noose.

THEODORE: (Throwing down the rope) No. I won't participate any further in my own murder.

ROGER: Execution, my friend. Words are important.

THEODORE: Shoot me then! That will make it murder!

ROGER: However I do it, it's an execution.

THEODORE: No

ROGER: I'm the executioner. It's a matter of definition. The man who writes the dictionary rules the nation. I can execute you now - (He pulls out the pistol.) Or you can have another minute or two to enjoy God's bounty on earth, while you tie the rope, while I test it, while we engage in scintillating dialect. Which do you prefer?

THEODORE: Shoot me. We might as well get it over with.

ROGER: That seems mighty shortsighted, my friend. Who knows what might occur in the next ninety seconds? An earthquake might kill me and free you. The rebels might stage an attack and divert my attention, allowing you to escape. There might be a coup from above. A foreign invasion. The Commander might commit suicide. You might receive a pardon. Don't forget - what's his name? You know, the Russian

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

THEODORE: Dostoevsky?

ROGER: That's the guy. Life is ruled by chance, old boy. Ninety seconds can seem like an eternity.

THEODORE: Everything is fated.

ROGER: An Augustinian!

THEODORE: There is a destiny

ROGER: God's? Or the inevitability of historical materialism? (THEODORE doesn't answer.)

THEODORE: I think for me ninety seconds will pass quickly.

ROGER: Time is relative.

THEODORE: Time marches forward inexorably.

ROGER: Inexorably.

THEODORE: Inexorably. I relish intellectual debate. Don't you? I haven't had a good discussion for a hell of a long time.

ROGER: (ROGER hands the rope again to THEODORE.) The noose.

THEODORE: I don't know how.

ROGER: I don't believe it.

THEODORE: It's not something you need to know in the normal course of a lifetime. (Disgusted, ROGER begins to make the noose.)

ROGER: The other executioners, you know, all they want to do is play cards, read girlie magazines. I'm out of my element.

THEODORE: I can see that. (He watches ROGER deftly make the noose.) You're very good.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

ROGER: Funny thing is, you guys usually have something to talk about. You seem to think more. It must be thinking that makes you dissatisfied with things.

THEODORE: It's not only thinking.

ROGER: I suppose not.

THEODORE: It's feeling, too. You know, intuitively, things aren't right.

ROGER: Well, it depends which side you're on, doesn't it? Like for me, things are right. (He completes the noose. He admires his work.)

THEODORE: But they're not.

ROGER: Of course they're right. Right as rain.

THEODORE: You're not happy.

ROGER: (Angrily) I'm happy!

THEODORE: You're a fish out of water. No intellectual companionship. No one to share ideas with.

ROGER: (Slipping the noose over THEODORE's head) Now there's where you're wrong, old sport. I have you to converse with. You and your compatriots. All day, every day, one after another, a veritable parade of intellect.

THEODORE: Perhaps you'd like to join us.

ROGER: Get myself executed?

THEODORE: Fight for a cause.

ROGER: Die before my time?

THEODORE: Live a meaningful life.

ROGER: Die like a dog? There's a flaw in your syllogism. (ROGER motions THEODORE onto the stool.)

THEODORE: Don't you feel some dishonesty? Killing people you have so much in common with?

ROGER: I don't find it dishonest, no. Poignant, perhaps. Ironic. Tragic, even. It's like playing a part in a great drama. It fulfills me. Whereas you become nameless, faceless, one of many who die futilely.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

THEODORE: Who knows what's futile?

ROGER: It's plain as the noose around your neck.

THEODORE: But don't we have some effect? Make some difference?

ROGER: Oh, yeah. I learn a lot. I sharpen my wits. You make a big difference to me.

THEODORE: Do I?

ROGER: Definitely. (THEODORE climbs onto the stool.)

THEODORE: I mean, do I? Do I, Theodore, make a difference to you?

ROGER: What do you mean?

THEODORE: Or am I just one of many who pass through your life? What's your name?

ROGER: My name? I have no name. So far as you're concerned.

THEODORE: Have you no conscience?

ROGER: Do you? Wouldn't you kill me if you could? Even after our thrilling conversation? You would. Because I'm on the other side. It would be my fate to die.

THEODORE: It would be a chance you would take.

ROGER: So you see, I have no choice.

THEODORE: You always have a choice.

ROGER: Do you? (ROGER gets ready to kick away the stool.)

THEODORE: One question - (ROGER pauses.) Does everyone participate in his own ... death?

ROGER: Oh, yes. We think it makes a point. It teaches a lesson.

THEODORE: But what good will it do now?

ROGER: That's the irony of it, isn't it? Any further last words?(Several beats. ROGER gets ready to kick away the stool.)

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

THEODORE: Proost.

ROGER: What?

THEODORE: Proost! It's pronounced Proost, not Prowst!

ROGER: You kidding me?

THEODORE: No.

ROGER: You're sure?

THEODORE: I'm positive.

ROGER: You know French?

THEODORE: Tres bien.

ROGER: Proost.

THEODORE: Proost.

ROGER: I could've gone on for years making a fool of myself.

THEODORE: I know. (Several beats)

ROGER: Well. We can't wait forever.

THEODORE: No. (Several beats)

ROGER: Roger.

THEODORE: Pardon?

ROGER: My name's Roger.

THEODORE: Ah. (Beat) Theodore.

ROGER: Right. (ROGER starts to kick away the stool, the stage goes to black, and there s a strange musical note, as of a string being plucked, the overtone lasting for several seconds.)

The rope sings like a nightingale as it snaps into the sweet memory of roses.

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY

It's a beautiful moment. Lyrical.

SOURCE INFORMATION

Author: William Borden
Book: More One-Act Plays for Acting Students
ISBN: 978-1566080873
Publisher: Meriwether Publishing
Date (Month/Year): July 2003

AWARD HISTORY

2001 National Qualifier

FOR EDUCATIONAL USE ONLY